CYBERBULLYING AND YOUR CHILD

Talk to your child about cyberbullying

Ask gentle questions to determine the situation.

Work with teachers, mentors, and guidance counselors to get support for your child.

Encourage your children to share with you if their friends or peers are bullied.

Educate your child about the repercussions about cyber-bullying.

Clarify that even liking or sharing hurtful content is unacceptable.

Encourage your child to reach out to others who are bullied and lend support.

What should you do if your child is bullied?

Document the bullying.

Take screenshots of abusive messages or behavior. This will help you report the bullying to the relevant authorities.

Talk to the teachers in school.

Make sure they are aware of the situation.

Report it to his or her school.

You can also report it to the social media or gaming platform where its hosted. If your child receives threats, don't hesitate to contact the police.

Talk to other parents and encourage them to speak to their children.

The background is a vibrant yellow, framed by a decorative border of stylized floral and scrollwork elements. The border includes teal and white flowers, pink and white leaves, black and white scrolls, and various colored dots. TODAY'S RESOURCE SHARED FROM MS.I. MATOS

- Parents of College Students need Legal Documents to Access Health, Financial and Education Information. (Parents of college students need legal documents to access health, financial and education information - New York Business Journal \(bizjournals.com\))

5 Things every parent needs to hear right now

01. You're still a good parent if you struggle, second-guess yourself, or sometimes want to quit.
02. You're still a good parent if you make mistakes.
03. You're still a good parent when you say "no."
04. You're still a good parent when your child's behavior...isn't so good.
05. You're still a good parent if you're doing your best in the moment—even if the moment is hard and you're still working on getting better.
